A private room in the old Willard Hotel, Washington. The room, a dream of marble pillars, stately fireplaces, old plush carpets, is garlanded with flowers. Stage left, there is a table heaped with flowers and presents; its center piece is six feet high - "a wedding bell of white roses surmounted by a heart of red roses, which is pierced by an arrow of violets, shot from a Cupid's bow of heliotrope."

The chief entrance to the room, rear center stage, is elevated by a stairway at least six steps high, so that a dramatic or dawdling descent may be made on it.

As the curtain rises, Mrs. Mc Court is rushing around the room, arranging the flowers. Mr. McCourt, his son and daughter (with Spouses if possible) are sitting uncomfortably on the gilt chairs to one side of the room.

A group of four Dandies (doubtless from the State Department) stand apart and aloof.
